Ealing, Hammersmith and West London College students get a competitive advantage in the jobs market

This year's crop of Ealing, Hammersmith and West London College students can look forward to the best possible preparation for their careers and gaining employment with help from ReedNCFE.

Reed have a fantastic reputation for staff recruitment which has been built up over many years. Their partnership with NCFE, a large qualification awarding body, offers a deep understanding of the relevance of modern qualifications in today's job market.

Reed NCFE's team of job preparation professionals have moved into their own 'work experience hub' at Hammersmith and Fulham College, and will offer outreach services to Ealing Green, Acton and Southall Community College.

Ray Shilling, Executive Director - Business Development and Planning at Ealing Hammersmith and West London College says: "The success of our students is at the centre of every initiative we take, it is our intention to support our students in getting relevant work experience whilst on course, then going on to gain employment within their chosen profession, progressing onto an apprenticeship or else some taking up further training.

"The approach we take ensures our students are 'Ready to Work, Ready to Learn'. The partnership will mean that our students are completely prepared for the world of work and have the sort of core work skills that employers are looking for to take their organisations forward."

Tom Millar, Managing Director of Reed NCFE says: "I am delighted that Reed NCFE is working with Ealing Hammersmith & West London's College. This is an ideal time and place to increase the number of apprenticeships as London businesses are expanding and also because there are lots of new construction and development projects in the area. Reed NCFE will help prepare the College's students for those
